In computer programming, single-threading is the processing of one command at a time. In the formal analysis of the variables' semantics and process state, the term single threading can be used differently to mean "backtracking within a single thread", which is common in the functional programming community.

A single-core, processor is a microprocessor with a single core on a chip, running a single thread computing thread at any one time. The system of single core consume a lot of time since running a single thread, this became more advanced after the emergence of multi-core processors which have several independent processors on a single chip hence performing a lot of function at a time.

Single-core - Wikipedia

Single threaded processes contain the execution of instructions in a single sequence. In other words, one command is processes at a time. The opposite of single threaded processes are multithreaded processes. These processes allow the execution of multiple parts of a program at the same time.
