Valuation is the most fundamental term founders encounter during a financing round and is crucial to understand when evaluating a term sheet. Valuation is generally thought of two ways – pre-money and post-money. The "pre-money valuation" is the investor's valuation of the company today, before the investment. The "post-money" valuation represents the pre-money valuation PLUS the amount of money raised in the round.

Valuation is arguably the most important component of the term sheet. A poor valuation can ruin a deal even if all other terms are in your favor. However, the inverse isn't necessarily true. A great valuation doesn't always outweigh unfavorable terms elsewhere on the term sheet.

Term Sheets: The Definitive Guide for Entrepreneurs
Term sheets are not binding (unless they specifically say so) except for the exclusivity provision which restricts founders from negotiating with other investors for a certain period (usually 30–60 days) after signing the term sheet. The term sheet is followed by a more detailed shareholders agreement which is binding and enforceable.

Term Sheets 101: A beginner's guide to VC term sheets
A Term Sheet is a document which outlines the key financial and other terms of a proposed investment. Investors use a Term Sheet as a basis for drafting the investment documents. With the exception of certain clauses – commonly those dealing with confidentiality, exclusivity and sometimes costs – provisions of a Term Sheet are not usually intended to be legally binding.
