"Brilliantly conceived and beautifully written, Why Don't American Cities Burn? is a terrific read that is difficult to put down. Katz considers changes over the past half-century through the lenses of urban geography and population demographics, institutional structures, the public's ossified view of the deserving and undeserving urban poor, and how the zeal for market-based solutions has led towards new poverty technologies that recast the poor as entrepreneurial actors.

Rejecting the attacks on American cities, capitalism, and conservatism, President Donald Trump campaign official Kimberly Guilfoyle delivered an impassioned address Monday at the Republican National Convention.
"In President Trump's America, we light things up, we don't dim them down," she said in one of the boldest deliveries in either party's convention to date.
